Abstract

In the past, commercial spaces fostered human economic needs through exchanges and were thought of as elements of a living setting. With the prevalence of modernity and dissemination of a consumer lifestyle, shopping centers are seen as places for what was ignored, which conflicts with Islamic teachings. As seen, shopping malls and commercial complexes are on the rise in metropolitans which also have left considerably destructive impacts; thus, it is required to make planning and policies to identify those impacts. Jurisprudential rules are major Islamic sources with procedures consistent with Islamic teachings, adapted to and coordinated with the setting. Thus, the research problem is to investigate the desirability of commercial centers using jurisprudential teachings as a modern urban phenomenon and raise the question: "What are the jurisprudential criteria affecting the establishment of commercial complexes?" The present research uses combined and analytical methods to review the problem and gather data via library and documentary sources. As the findings revealed, commercial centers in modern cities conflict with jurisprudential rules and lack desirability. According to an intra-religious analysis, to make commercial complexes consistent with Islamic teachings, urban planners and architects need to take into account some major issues such as attention to places where the centers are set up, their appropriate location in the urban plan, ease of access, horizontal development of commercial centers, definition and construction of special centers for training commerce, especially issues related to jurisprudential subjects inside or in adjacency with the commercial centers, measures not to create stamping ground and collective resorts or entertainment and recreational sites, creation of a balance between usable and non-usable spaces commensurate with citizen's needs and avoidance of ostentation and demonstration.
